THE GILDED RESET

Version 1.0 · A4

Pick your one thing

One habit. Not three, not a whole morning routine, not a new you. One small thing you will do every day for thirty days. Small is the point: you are building the habit of showing up, and that matters more than the habit itself.

The habit I'm building

What it looks like on my worst day

The two-minute version. If you couldn't do it while exhausted, make it smaller.

When I'll do it

Tie it to something you already do. "After I brush my teeth" works. "In the morning" doesn't.

Why this, and why now

Write the real reason. On day twelve, this is what you'll reread.

Check your pick

- ☐ I can do the smallest version in under two minutes.
- ☐ It happens at the same point in my day.
- ☐ I would still be glad I did it on a terrible day.

THE RULE

Can't tick all three? Shrink the habit until you can. A habit you actually do beats a better one you skip.

Thirty days, one box at a time

Habit _____ Started on _____

1 	2 	3 	4 	5 	6
7 	8 	9 	10 	11 	12
13 	14 	15 	16 	17 	18
19 	20 	21 	22 	23 	24
25 	26 	27 	28 	29 	30

Tick the box the moment you finish, not at the end of the day. The gold corners mark days 7, 14, 21 and 30. Missed a day? Leave the box empty and turn to page 4 tonight.

Longest streak _____ days Days completed _____ / 30

The day you miss

You will miss a day. Everyone does. A habit doesn't break on the day you miss; it breaks on the second day, when one miss quietly becomes the new pattern. So there is only one rule to remember.

Never miss twice.

Tomorrow, do the rescue version

Do only the worst-day version you wrote on page 2. It counts as a full day. A two-minute day keeps the chain alive, and the chain is what you are really building.

Tonight, answer these before bed

What got in the way? The real reason, in one line.

Was the habit too big for that day?

What I'll do differently tomorrow

One habit in. Now build the rest of the day.

Thirty days of one habit proves you can keep a promise to yourself. The next step is a routine that holds your morning and evening together, including on the days that fall apart.
